British Home Secretary Warns Provocative Words, Disorder, Destructive Action By Extremists Will Not Be Tolerated By Government

[redacted] Glass reports] Mr. [redacted] What the Home Secretary was [redacted] the telephone. On one occasion (he said) they announced that they were coming that evening to "serve [redacted] Last Sunday they conveyed [redacted] application that they [redacted] in the end." [redacted] going to be [redacted] [redacted] Parliament should see its way [redacted] approval on the campaign of [redacted] intolerance and discrimination [redacted] would make that intolerance and discrimination illegal.

Sir Henry D'Avigdor-Goldsmid (Walsall, South C.) said that twice during his period in Parliament he and Sir Barnett Janner had come into contact with a grave anti-Jewish manifestation — attempts to stop the sale of Jewish killed beef. In both instances these were brought by people with the highest moral standards, actuated by the highest motives, who relied on information provided for them by people who were not at all concerned about the welfare of animals but greatly concerned about the "welfare of men."

This was the sort of covert attack which no amount of legislation would ever prevent — the sort of attack which made it clear that people could not be made good by law.

He supported the Home Secretary's approach. Free speech had brought enormous benefit. A lot of people who were anxious to curtail free speech, says the London Times, would find it not very agreeable if it were curtailed in other directions.

Sir Norman Lamont (Kingston, North-West, Lab.) said that a circular had been issued by British citizens in German and was being distributed in Germany. Translated, it said:

"We in Britain salute the heroic victory 38 years ago under the leadership of Adolph Hitler and the achievements of the National Socialist movement. National Socialist manifestations are most severely punished in Germany. In the world outside, a new movement exists. The National Socialist revival has begun. We have united with the National Socialist movement in the United States and other countries. The day will come when the Swastika will fly again. We say once again: 'Sieg Heil'."

This was being distributed in the name of an organisation that was asking permission to hold meetings to advocate its policies in Britain.

Mr. Ball (South Buckinghamshire, C.) said the right attitude was that enshrined in the present law that people should be allowed to express what opinions they liked, provided that they did it in a grave and serious manner.

The change which Mr. Iremonger and Mr. Skeet wanted to introduce represented the first breach in that principle.

Communists did not believe in freedom of speech, but it would be wrong to proscribe the Communist Party in Britain. They should have full freedom of speech to attack the institution of freedom of speech. The same freedom should be given to extremists of the right. Let them attack freedom of speech or any other institution if they did it in a grave and serious manner and not by violent and provocative use of words.

The Times in a leading article on August 25, 1962, expressed views on this subject with which he entirely identified himself. It said that it was no function of the criminal law to articulate the conscience of society.

Mr. Weitzman (Stoke Newington and Hackney, North, Lab.) said a strong case could be made out for the insertion of the words suggested by Mr. Iremonger. Legislation against racial incitement existed in practically every country in Europe except Britain which boasted of free speech and looking after the rights of minorities.

Mr. Skeet (Willesden, East, Lab.) said he had been informed that a prosecution was not to be brought against a leaflet headed, "Hitler was right", says the London Times. Nothing in this Act (he said) will enable a prosecution to be brought on this document which is equally as vicious, equally as poisonous as any speech made. A speech is spoken, that speech on paper, and it is extremely dangerous.

Mr. Bowen, (Cardigan, L.) said the increase of the penalties un-

What the Home Secretary was being asked to do in the only appropriate place in British law what the Government had been wholly engaged in doing in the past few years in the constitutions of the new sovereign states of the Commonwealth.

I would not want Mr. Iremonger (he said) to go away with the impression that the Government had any intention of clamping down on all meetings, demonstrations and protests simply because I was afraid the law was not sufficiently effective to bite, and because I was only concerned about peace and order and not at all concerned about the doctrine of freedom of speech.

The police did not want to close meetings before they could help it. They waited until trouble had blown up and passions were aroused. Not only had they then to face a most unpleasant situation and risk a good deal of maltreatment, but in order to cut it off quickly they had to use a good deal of force themselves, says the London Times. It was at this point that people got out of sympathy with the police and assumed they were on the side of the Fascists or thugs or whoever were causing the trouble.

I know well (he added) because I have been a victim of it—at a famous May Day meeting I was very much the victim of it—that people go out to break up a meeting, and when they [redacted] When people do that and when they are trying to brain me with a flag pole, there is no reason why I should want to see them free from stiff penalties.

But that is not the way this mostly happens. It mostly happens as an audience response either to what is said or to the advertisements put out in advance about what is going to be said. It is a reaction to provocation, and I cannot believe it is in accordance with our sense of justice or reality that those people committing that offence as a reaction to provocation should be punished as heavily as those who do the provoking.

He hoped the Home Secretary would have an open mind to an amendment which would make the penalty for provocation notably heavier than the penalty which fell on those who allowed themselves, foolishly, to be provoked. The Opposition would try hard to amend the Bill in that way.

Mr. Iremonger, (Ilford, North C.) said he welcomed the Bill as far as it went. It was a pity the Government had felt it necessary to take two bites at the cherry. In spite of the decision against Jordan, the Fascist leader, in the High Court, the words of the section 5 of the Public Order Act should be clarified in the interests of precision and the maintenance of public order in future, because a decided case was not so firm a guide as words written into an Act.

The amendment he wanted was to insert in Section 5 "or words inciting hatred of any section of the public." This differed from the amendment he had proposed last year in that he had substituted the words "any section of the public" for "any racial group".

If anyone defended the right of free men to indulge in incitement to hatred on the grounds of freedom of speech or grounds of liberty he must defend the pathological murderer also. Those who wanted to defend hatred and did so by calling in aid principles of liberty were bluebags.

He wanted to make it certain that incitement to hatred was known to be an abuse within the meaning of the Act, says the London Times. It had been argued that incitement to hatred was difficult for the police to recognise and should therefore not be specified in the Act, but he wondered if it was any more difficult to recognise than "abuse".

Mr. Greenwood (Rossendale, Lab.) said the Home Secretary had lost the opportunity of consolidating and codifying the law in a way which would have had the support of all members of the Labour Party, the Liberal Party, and many members of the Conservative Party.

Since he made a speech in this House there had been [redacted] telephone calls and threats over

The Bill would make the new maximum penalties on summary conviction £100 or three months or both; on conviction on indictment, £500 or 12 months, or both. This [redacted] for the change of rules in order."

Section 1 of the Public Meeting Act, 1908, contained maximum penalties laid down 55 years ago of a fine of £5 or one month's imprisonment. The Bill raised this to the same maximum as in the other case—on indictment a fine of £500 or 12 months' imprisonment, or both.

One would deal with the speakers of provocative words and the other with wilful breakers-up of meetings.

He respected the integrity of those members who believed the Government should go further. He would ask them what their evidence was. He found it hard to see what would be achieved by adding to the Public Order Act the words: ". . . or words inciting hatred of any racial group of her Majesty's subjects."

What words likely to be used to incite hatred would not be threatening, abusive, or insulting? If they were that, they would be punishable by the law as it stood. He did not believe it was right to complicate the criminal law with words which added nothing—to do it just as a gesture. The extra words would not have had the effect of drawing anything Mosley had said in the past few years into a breach of the law.

The Bill would introduce into British law a concept of race which was alien to the law as it stood, says the London Times. I have no desire (he said) to be the Home Secretary who introduced into the law the concept that some of my fellow citizens were special or distinctive from other members of the areas to which they belong. I would ask my friends in the Jewish community and elsewhere to think carefully whether this sort of legal difference in society is what they really desire.

Mr. George Brown (Belper, Lab.) said the Home Secretary had spoken rather as though freedom of speech was an absolute. It was not. Obscenity and blasphemy were offences in themselves, and the police already moved against them. What must be looked at was whether uttering words of hatred against a race or group should not be put in the same category as obscenity and blasphemy. There was a danger, as things stood, of allowing a steady growth in activity by those who would destroy free speech and freedom of assembly.

He had a document issued by a certain organisation which for sheer unbelievable bestial references to various minority groups in the community it was hard to match. The degree to which they were prepared to go in heralding their views showed the way, the extent to which they were willing to go. What must be did as a great supporter of liberty, were evil words [redacted] in themselves, they did tremendous harm.

Published Paper Denounced By FBI As "Vitriolic Hate Sheet"

Conde J. McGinley, aged 73 years, publisher of Common Sense which the FBI has denounced as a "vitriolic hate sheet," died of cancer after a long illness. Mr. McGinley, a retired restaurateur, and his son, Conde jr., began publishing their semi-monthly tract in 1946, calling it "America's newspaper against Communism."

Last year its circulation was listed as 61,000 and apparently a good many subscribers didn't care to advertise their status because Common Sense goes into the mail in plain envelopes, says the New York Herald Tribune. Mr. McGinley, who also printed various kinds of pamphlets for sale, held monthly meetings in his home. A recent session heard a representative of the Arab League outline the Arab's case against Israel.

Mr. McGinley and his publication have been attacked by a wide variety of people and organizations. Among them are the FBI, the American Legion, the House Un-American Activities Committee, a number of state Legislatures, the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Newark, and the Anti-Defamation League of Bnai Brith.

There is pending in the New Jersey State Senate a resolution calling Mr. McGinley "a bigot who is anti-Negro, anti-Catholic, and anti-Jew."

The House Committee on Un-American Activities charged after a 1954 investigation that anti-Semitism was Mr. McGinley's chief stock in trade. He answered: "We do not oppose Jews because of their religious beliefs. We are opposed to the organized Marxist [redacted] and Communism is nothing but a front for the Jews."

A spokesman at Mr. McGinley's office said he belonged to the Roman Catholic Church and would be buried after a mass at St. Michael's Church. "He was never anti-Catholic," the spokesman said, reports the New York Times. "He

Bonn Cabinet Approves Amendments To Restitution Law Liberalizing Payments To Victims Of Nazis

The West Germany Cabinet approved an amendment to existing indemnification laws that would add $750,000,000 to pensions and other payments to individual survivors of Nazi persecutions. This was the second liberalising change in West Germany's restitution legislation approved by the Cabinet for submission to Parliament.

The Government adopted an amendment to a 1957 law providing for more liberal restitution payments to Jews and other persecution victims whose property was confiscated by the Nazis, says the New York Times. That amendment envisions additional outlays of $400,000,000.

Finance Minister Rolf Dahlgrün said the two amendments would increase to about $10,000,000,000 the total of West German indemnification and restitution payments to be made in settlement for Nazi crimes. About $7,000,000,000 has already been expended, Dr. Dahlgrün said.

West Germany's payment obligations under the existing indemnification law, covering compensation to individuals who suffered by imprisonment or maltreatment, are estimated at $6,500,000,000. A total of $3,750,000,000 had been paid out by the end of 1962.

A 1953 restitution law set a ceiling of $400,000,000 in compensation for private property seized by the Nazi authorities. Ninety per cent of the victims of such seizures were Jews.

In addition to payments to private individuals, Bonn committed [redacted] to Israel and to the Jewish Conference on Material Claims, representing Jewish interests outside Israel. All of this money has now been obligated for payment.

Bonn has also committed $1,000,000,000 in compensation under agreements with other countries and claimant groups.

The legislation being prepared is designed to cover individual claims not now recognized. The amendments would also increase certain payments such as monthly pensions.

The most significant concession to claimants' interests in the proposed amendments would make provision for persons who were unable to file their claims before cut-off dates specified in the original legislation, says the New York Times. The amendments would set up "hardship funds" out of which claims of late-filing individuals would be paid.

The fund proposed for cases falling under the indemnification law is $150,000,000. For belated restitution claims the fund would amount to $100,000,000.

Leaders of the Jewish Materials Claims Conference, who conferred with Chancellor Adenauer and other officials early in June have filed a protest against the hardship-fund formula.

The Claims Conference charged in a statement that the hardship-fund cause amounted to "an attempt to take away certain rights from categories of Nazi victims that they enjoyed until now."

The Claims Conference complained in particular against West Germany's continued refusal to honor indemnification claims of Jews who left East European countries after 1953. The Government does not honor claims of persecuted persons living in Eastern Europe.

A Government spokesman defended the proposed legislation by asserting that it was designed to "reopen the whole restitution and indemnification process." The Government is willing to consider special cases of persecuted persons who left Eastern Europe after the deadline, but it cannot write a blank check against any future claims, he said, reports the New York Times. The two amendments are expected to be enacted before the end of the year.

This is Mr. Tenney's second gift to the Hebrew University School of Dentistry. His first was an endowment for perpetual student aid in that faculty. Israel Easily Builds Young Into Life Of Country

Moshe Sharett, former Israeli premier and foreign minister said in Toronto that Israel is encountering enormous problems assimilating adult immigrants, but its educational system is having marked success incorporating young persons rapidly into the life and culture of the country.

Mr. Sharett, who guided Israeli foreign policy from 1948 to 1956 and who now serves in the Knesset (Parliament), told the congregation at Beth Tzedec Synagogue that it would be many years before Israel blends its many different elements into a relatively homogeneous nation.

As elsewhere in the world, older immigrants passively resist government attempts to educate them to a new outlook, Mr. Sharett said. The young, on the other hand, are quicker to gain a sense of national identity and purpose.

The former premier said that in its attempts to build new citizens Israel nevertheless is determined to give full respect and recognition to minority groups. This includes the Arabs, Christian, and Moslem, who number about 200,000, or almost 10 per cent of the population of the new state which celebrated last month the 15th year of its existence.

Among their privileges, these have the right to vote and be elected to the Knesset. As a mark of their individuality, their speeches in Parliament, usually in their own tongue, are simultaneously translated and permanently recorded in Arabic, he said.

Despite a continuous propaganda barrage from the Arab countries, these Arab members have a manifest desire for peace and are in the forefront of those attempting to achieve harmonious relations between Israel and her neighbors, Mr. Sharett said.

THE JEWISH PUBLIC SHOULD KNOW THAT THE CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS IS ALERT TO THE PROBLEM OF CRISIS IN CANADA TODAY, AND IN POSSESSION OF ITS IMPORTANCE AND APPLICATION

BY MICHAEL BARKER, Q.C., OF MONTREAL, PRESIDENT OF THE CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS

The crisis in Canadian life today on matters of an accommodation between those of English and French origin represents the most serious one in many decades and may, when historical perspective is possible, be adjudged the single most important aspect of Canadian development.

The intricacies of the problem are many and this letter does not purpose to analyze le fait français but to acquaint you with certain phases. Primarily the problem is a concern for every single resident and citizen of Canada whatever his ethnic, cultural or religious origin and irrespective of the date he or his ancestors settled in Canada. But there are phases which do and will concern the Jewish population of Quebec and indeed elsewhere in Canada.

What is popularly called the ferment or revolution in French Canada is basically a new phenomenon though separatism and nationalism have a long career. The latter goes back to the Rebellion of 1837 with sporadic outbreaks ever since, the best known of which are reflected in the politics early this century of Henri Bourrassa and Armand Lavergne, and more latterly by the group known as the Bloc Populaire and the Jeunes Ouvriers Catholiques. The newer ferment is of course much more than a political, chauvinistic or isolationist philosophy but stems from real changes in French Canadian thinking, the apostles of which were Fathers O'Neill, Dion, Levesque and the missionaries, many French Canadian intellectuals who received their broadening education at Harvard, Chicago, and in Europe. The problem has become, therefore, one inextricably made up of economics, politics, and government and social changes including cultural and demographic ones.

We are now at the point where responsible, as well as irresponsible, French Canadian leaders have laid down an ultimatum, based on the premise that Confederation had failed because a bilingual-bicultural confederation was guaranteed but has never been practiced, and that unless we have a live and meaningful bicultural and bilingual Canada with two nations as its prop, i.e. the Anglo-Saxon and the French Canadian, Quebec may not tolerate living in such a Canada.

Many federal campaign (1963 election) promises were made in recognition of the serious situation. We now have the Federal Government's proposal for a Royal Commission to enquire into the entire matter, "Taking into account the contribution made by the other ethnic groups to the cultural enrichment of Canada and the measures that should be taken to safeguard that contribution", and we have a Cabinet Ministry (the portfolio of the Privy Council) charged with the responsibility of discharging government policy on the holding of this Royal Commission and all matters related to the French Canadian position. Mr. Maurice Lamontagne, the President of the Privy Council and the Minister in charge, is himself a graduate of Chicago University (Economics) and a well known figure in French Canadian intellectual circles.

Obviously any proposition that calls for basic discussions, enquiry into the "existing state of bilingualism and biculturalism and to recommend what steps should be taken to develop the Canadian Confederation on the basis of an equal partnership between the two founding races" fundamentally affects the status and dignity of others not of the "founding races".

It is important for members of the Jewish Community to note that the Canadian Jewish Congress is seized of the problem and indeed has concerned itself with other manifestations of French Canadian nationalism for many years.

On the particular matters now before the Canadian people, you may want to know:

(a). A special department of Congress' community relations and adult education work is devoted exclusively to the development of linguistic and cultural contacts with French Canada. It was established fifteen years ago. Its organ, le Bulletin du Cercle Juif, has a very loyal following among influential French Canadians. Le Cercle Juif de Langue Française has had hundreds of lecture meetings at which the audience is at times over 50 per cent non-Jewish. Its secretary has represented Congress in many most important and useful conferences and meetings of French language journalists, educators, and teachers.

(b). Recently the National Executive Committee of Congress authorized the formation of a national ad hoc committee comprising professors of law, Sociology, Political Science, Economics; lawyers, and others with Officers of Congress ex officio. This committee has already been set up and will study the relevant material, express views on a questionnaire and meet in conference in due course. Its aims and objects are to advise the National Executive Commitee of Congress on the issue of the Jewish position before the Royal Commission and related matters and to recommend course of action.

(c). A senior officer of Congress has had candid discussions with a very senior civil servant responsible for the implementation of government policy on bilingualism and biculturalism. This same officer was requested to meet with the Hon. Maurice Lamontagne, President of the Privy Council. At this meeting it was understood that in addition to the formal representation to a Royal Commission, Congress would be welcome to hold discussions with the Ministry in charge.

(d). As to the provincial aspects very little has yet been attempted. It should be stressed that were the subject fairly and squarely one of bilingualism, it would be much easier to consider and plan remedial action though difficulties here must not be underestimated. However, it is enormously complicated by the issue of biculturalism and an overlay of political calculations. Perhaps it is not out of place to quote one French Canadian leader of finance, not a political figure, who represents responsibility and moderation who, in a speech in March of this year, was not inhibited from saying, "Quebec is at present no longer engaged in soul searching psychiatry. She is sure of herself and of her mind. Her question is whether she can be sure of Canada when she looks to the future and to the world".

The Jewish public should know that the Canadian Jewish Congress is not only alert to the problem but is studiously seized of its importance and implication.

PUBLISHED PAPER DENOUNCED BY FBI

worked all his life for the Catholic church and there was never a word in our publication against Catholicism. He only fought Communism."

The paper is published by the Christian Educational Association, which also puts out pamphlets, books, and records. The House committee said it found interlocking ties between Common Sense and the National Renaissance party, an American Fascist group.

A native of Norman, Oklahoma, Mr. McGinley was a salesman of restaurant equipment who later opened a chain of restaurants in New Jersey, says the New York Herald Tribune. During World War II he worked in a New Jersey defense plant. When he lost his job at the end of the war, he founded his publication under the title of "Think". About a year later he changed its name and moved to present quarters — his 14-room house at 530 Chestnut Street, Union, N. J.

Common Sense frequently charges that Communism is simply part of an international Jewish plot to take over the world. Another "warning" has been the forecast that the Communists will assist the Negroes to set up a black state in the South.

In addition to attacking Jews, Catholics, and Negroes, Common Sense has come out against the United Nations, integration, fluoridation, taxes, disarmament, the Supreme Court, Harvard University, the State Department, unification of the Congo, and all Presidents of the United States for the last 30 years.

In addition to its admitted circulation, Common Sense often has been mailed out free in large volume. In 1954 the House Un-American Activities Committee identified Benjamin H. Freedman, a retired toilet goods manufacturer, of New York, as one of the paper's financial backers.

During the time of the riots last year at the University of Mississippi, Mr. McGinley shipped 10,000 copies of Common Sense to Gov. Ross Barnett, of whom the paper said, according to the New York Herald Tribune, "God bless this man — may his tribe increase."

BRITISH HOME SECRETARY WARNS EXTREMISTS

der Section 5 of the Public Order Act, 1936, were derisory.

While the words proposed by Mr. Iremonger added nothing to the Act that was not there already, there would be a considerable advantage in adding them. Insulting behaviour leading to racial hatred was a particular form of abuse to which it was desirable that attention should be drawn.

Mr. Shepherd (Cheadle, C.) said there were people in Britain who were capable of recreating the horrors of Nazi Germany, but the difference was that the vast majority in Britain would not be prepared to allow it to go on once they knew of its existence.

He wondered whether all minorities were carrying out their responsibilities as well as they might. The great problem with the Jewish community was that they lived as a race apart. Good relations would be better served if there was less positive seclusion among the Jewish community. Now that there was a Jewish national home it was desirable that there should be more integration and even assimilation.

Mr. Michael Foot (Ebbw Vale, Lab.) said it was one of the most miserable little Bills he had ever seen. It would do nothing to prevent the spread of racial hatred but it might increase the penalties against innocent demonstrators who were trying to put their point of view.

There are many people in London today (he said) who want to protest against the visit of Queen Frederika because of what they consider to be the tyranny prevailing in Greece. They have a perfect right to demonstrate. Somebody has interfered with their right; that is a police decision. If this Bill was in operation some of those people would have their penalties increased, possibly to £500 or 12 months' imprisonment.

Mr. Norman Pannell (Liverpool, Kirkdale, C.) said that if Mr. Foot's views were accepted and the law amended as he suggested he (Mr. Pannell) might find himself wrongly accused of being guilty under such an Act and his liberty of speech in stating the facts to the country, as he had tried to do, seriously affected.

Mr. Fletcher (Islington, East, Lab.) asked why the Home Secretary resisted the demand that the use of words relating to racial hatred should be made an offence. If the argument was that such words were unnecessary, he would remind the House that until the decision of the Divisional Court in the Jordan case there was the greatest ambiguity about what the words of Section 5 mean.
